Expand Your Teaching Palette

I want you to think like a painter for just a moment. They have a few tools at the beginning of the process, a canvas, a few primary colors, a brush, and a palette. This palette along with a few primary colors hold the possibility of infinite shades across the entire spectrum of color.

Right now, most pastors only lead with the primary colors in isolation.

- the isolated tithing message
- the isolated stewardship series
- the isolated vision fundraising series.

Let me help you create a multi-colored palette that can give you freedom and unleash generosity.

Four Questions To Widen The Conversation and Increase Confidence

1. What are the attributes of a generous person?

2. What are some of the obstacles that can prohibit these attributes from being fully released?

3. What practical applications do I need to encourage and teach towards?

4. What life seasons are these topics more or less applicable?

Applications:

1. Create your own version of descriptive words for a generous disciple. Make it something you are personally passionate about, can relate to, and lead towards.

2. Pick the top ten attributes.
 - a. What obstacles exist for each attribute?

Notes

b. What practical applications can you point towards for each attribute?

c. What personal stories do you have that you can help people relate to both the obstacles and applications?

d. How can you relate these stories to the different seasons of life your listeners might be experiencing?

3. How many years would it take you to teach a sermon series on each of these ten attributes?
